

Fundamentals of Marketing Management

Manish Singh Mahar; Manish & Deepak Singh Bisht

Department of Electronics & Communication Dronacharya College of Engineering, Gurgaon depak.19203@ggnindia,dronacharya.info, manish.16232@ggnindia,dronacharya.info manish.16301@ggnindia.dronacharya.info

1.1 Abstract

This paper deals with basics of the marketing process, marketingconcept and marketing mix i.e. product, price, place and promotion. Marketing is indeed an ancient art; it has been practiced in one form or the other. Today, it has become the most vital function in the world of business. Marketing is the business function that identifies unfulfilled needs and wants, and hence defines and measures their magnitude, determines which target market the organization can best serve, decides on appropriate products, services and programmes to serve these markets, and calls upon everyone in the organization to think and serve the customer.

1.2 Introduction

Marketing is a process by which individuals and groups obtain what they need and want through creating and exchange product and value with other. Simply put: Marketing is the delivery of customer satisfaction at a profit.

"Marketing is so basic that it cannot be considered as separate function. It is the whole business seen from the point of view of its final result, that is, from the customer's point of view". - Peter Drucker

The term "market" originates from the Latin word "Marcatus" which means "a place where business is conducted." A layman regards market as a place where buyers and sellers personally interact and finalise deals. Marketing is the force that harnesses a nation's industrial capacity to meet the society's material wants. It uplifts the standard of living of people in society.Marketing must not be seen narrowly as the task of finding clever ways to sell the company's products. Many people confuse marketing with some of its sub functions, such as advertising and selling. Authentic marketing is not the art of selling what you make but knowing what to make. It is the art of identifying and understanding customer needs and creating solutions that deliver satisfaction to the customers, profit to the producers, and benefits for the stakeholders. Market leadership is gained by creating customer satisfaction through product innovation, product quality, and customer service. If these are absent, no amount of advertising, sales promotion, or salesmanship can compensate.

The Marketing Objective

"Satisfy the needs of a group of customers better than the competition."

- Distinguish from Selling or Advertising: – merely a subset of marketing actions used to satisfy consumer needs.
- Marketing focuses on the use of all the firm's controllable influences to satisfy the customer.

Activities in the Marketing Process

- Identify needs of customers that company can satisfy.
- Design a products that satisfies those needs better than existing products.
- Promote these benefits in order to motivate purchase.
- Price the product at the right level so that consumers are willing & able to buy the product and the firm's profit goals are met.
- Make the product available at the right Place so that exchange is facilitated.

Broad Objective of Marketing

- To grow the business by adapting it to changes in the environment.
- By monitoring,i. Change in customer needs. ii. Changes in competition. iii. Changes in the company's own skills / resources.
- Looking for opportunities & threats that arise from these changes.
- Initiate tactical actions that "fit" the co's offering to these opportunities / threat.

1.3 Definitions and terminology

There are as many definitions of marketing as many scholars or writersin this field. It has been defined in various ways by different writers. There are varying perceptions and viewpoints on the meaning and content of marketing. Some important definitions are:

- Marketing is a social and managerial process by which individualsand groups obtain what they need and want through creating, offering and exchanging products of value with others.
- Marketing is the process by which an organization relatescreatively, productively and profitably to the market place.
- Marketing is the art of creating and satisfying customers at aprofit.
- Marketing is getting the right goods and services to the right peopleat the right places at the right time at the right price with the rightcommunication and promotion. Much of marketing is concerned with the problem of profitably disposing what is produced.
- Marketing is the phenomenon brought about by the pressures ofmass production and increased spending power.
- Marketing is the performance of business activities that direct theflow of goods and services from the producer to the customer.
- Marketing is the economic process by which goods and services are exchanged between the maker and the user and their values determined in terms of money prices.
- Marketing is designed to bring about desired exchanges with

- targetaudiences for the purpose of mutual gain.
- Marketing activities are concerned with the demand stimulatingand demand fulfilling efforts of the enterprise.

It is obvious from the above definitions of marketing that marketing hasbeen viewed from different perspective. Now it is imperative to discussthe important terms on which definition of marketing rests: needs, wants, and demands; products; value, cost, and satisfaction; exchange, transactions and relationships; markets; and marketers. These terms are also known as the core concepts in marketing.

Needs, wants and demands

Marketing starts with the human needs and People need food, air, water, clothing and shelter to survive. They also have a strong desire forrecreation, health, education, and other services. They have strongperformances for particular versions and brands of basic goods andservices. A human need is a state of felt deprivation of some basicsatisfaction. People require food. shelter, clothing, safety, belonging, esteem and a few other things for survival. These needs are not createdby their society or by marketers; they exist in the very texture of humanbiology and the human condition.

Wants are desires for specific satisfiers of these deeper needs. For example, one needs food and wants a pizza, needs clothing and wants a Raymond shirt. These needs are satisfied in different manners indifferent societies. While people needs are few, their wants are unlimited. Human wants are continually shaped and reshaped by social forces andinstitutions. Demands are wants for specific products that are backed up by an abilityand willingness to buy them. For example, many people want to buy aluxury car but they lack in purchasing it. Companies must therefore measure not only how many people want their products, but, how manywould actually be willing to buy and finally able to buy it.

Products

People satisfy their needs and wants with products. Product can bedefined as anything that can be offered to someone to satisfy a need orwant. The word product brings to mind a physical object, such as T.V., Car, and Camera etc. The expression products and services are useddistinguish between physical objects and intangible ones. Theimportance of physical products does not lie in owning them rather usingthem to satisfy our wants. People do not buy beautiful cars to look at, but because it supply transportation service. Thus, physical products are really vehicles that deliver services to people.

Services are also supplied by other vehicles such as persons, places, activities, organizations and ideas. If people are bored, they can go to amusical concert (persons) for entertainment, travel to beautifuldestination like Shimla (place), engage in physical exercise (activity) inhealth clubs, join a laughing club (organization) or adopt differentphilosophy about life (idea). Services can delivered be through physicalobjects and other vehicles. The term product covers physical products, service products. and other vehicles that are capable of delivering satisfaction of a need or want. The other terms also used for products areoffers, satisfiers, or resources.

Value, cost, and satisfaction

How do consumers choose among the various products that may satisfy given need is very interesting procedure. If a student needs to travelfive km to his college every day, he may choose a number ofproducts that will satisfy this need: bicycle, a motorcycle, automobileand a bus. These alternatives constitute product choice set. Assume thatthe student wants to satisfy different needs in travelling to his college,namely speed, safety, ease and economy. These are called the need set. Each product has a different capacity to satisfy different needs. Forexample, bicycle will be slower, less safe and more effortful anautomobile, but it would be more economical. Now, the student has todecide on which product delivers the most satisfaction. Here comes the concept of value. The student will form an estimate of thevalue of each product in satisfying his needs. He might rank theproducts from the most need satisfying to the least need satisfying. Valueis the consumer's estimate of the product's overall capacity to satisfy hisor her needs. The student can imagine the characteristics an idealproduct that would take him to his college split second with absolutesafety, no effort and zero cost. The value of each actual product woulddepend on how close it came to this ideal product. Assume the student is primarily interested in the speed and case ofgetting to college. If the student was offered any of the above mentioned products at no cost, one can predict that he would choose anautomobile. Here comes the concept of cost. Since each product involvesa cost, the student will not necessarily buy automobilecosts automobile. The substantially more than bicycle motorcycle. Therefore, he willconsider the product's value and price before making a choice. He willchoose the product that will produce the most value per rupee. Today's consumer behaviour theorists have gone beyond narroweconomic assumptions of how consumers form value in this mind andmake product choices. These modern theories on consumer behaviourare important to marketers because the whole marketing plan rests on assumptions about how customers make choices. Therefore the conceptof value, cost and satisfaction are crucial to the discipline of marketing.

Exchange, transactions and relationships

The fact that people have needs and wants and can place value onproducts does not fully explain the concept of marketing. Marketingemerges when people decide to satisfy needs and wants throughexchange. Exchange is one of the four ways people can obtain productsthey want. The first way is self production. People can relieve hungerthrough hunting, fishing, or fruit gathering. In this case there is nomarket or marketing. The second way is coercion. Hungry people cansteal food from others. The third way is begging. Hungry people canapproach others and beg for food. They have nothing tangible to offerexcept gratitude. The fourth way is exchange. Hungry people canapproach others and offer some resource in exchange, such as money, another food, or service.

Marketing arises from this last approach to acquire products. Exchangeis the act of obtaining a desired product from someone by offeringsomething in return. For exchange to take place, five conditions must be atisfied:

There are at least two parties.

- Each party has something that might be of value to the otherparty.
- Each party is capable of communication and delivery.
- Each party is free to accept or reject the offer.
- Each party believes it is appropriate or desirable to deal with theother party.

If the above conditions exist, there is a potential for exchange. Exchangeis described as a value creating process and normally leaves both theparties better off than before the exchange. Two parties are said to beengaged in exchange if they are and moving negotiating towards anagreement. The process of trying to arrive at naturally agreeable terms iscalled negotiation. If an agreement is reached, we sav that a transactiontakes place. Transactions are the basic unit of exchange. A transactionconsists of a trade of values between two parties. A transaction involvesseveral dimensions; at least two things of value, agreed upon conditions,a time of agreement, and a place of agreement. Usually a legal systemarises to support and enforce compliance on the part of the transaction.

A transaction differs from a transfer. In a transfer A gives X to B but doesnot receive anything tangible in return. When A gives

B a gift, a subsidy, or a charitable contribution, we call this a transfer.

Transaction marketing is a part of longer idea, that of relationshipmarketing. Smart marketers try to build up long term, trusting, 'win-win'relationships with customers, distributors, dealers and suppliers.

Markets

The concept of exchange leads to the concept of market. A marketconsists of all the potential customers sharing a particular need or wantwho might be willing and able to engage in exchange to satisfy that needor want. The size of market depends upon the number of persons whoexhibit the need, have resources that interest others, and are willing tooffer these resources in exchange for what they want.

Marketing, marketers, and marketing management

The concept of marketing brings the full circle the concept to of marketing.Marketing means human activities taking place in relation to markets.Marketing means working with markets to actualize potential exchangesfor the purpose of satisfying human needs and wants. If one party ismore actively seeking an exchange than the other party, we call the firstparty a marketer and the second party a prospect. A marketer issomeone seeking a resource from someone else and willing to offersomething of value in exchange. The marketer is seeking a response fromthe other party, either to sell something buy or to something. Marketercan be a seller or a buyer. Suppose several persons want to buy anattractive house that has just become available. Each would be buyerwill try to market himself or herself to be the one the seller selects. Thesebuyers are doing the marketing. In the event that both parties activelyseek an exchange, we say that both of them are marketers and call thesituation one of reciprocal marketing. In the normal situation, the marketer is a company serving a market ofend users in the face of competitors. The company and competitorssend their respective products and messages directly and/or throughmarketing intermediaries i.e. middlemen and facilitators to the endusers.

Marketing management takes place when at least one party to a potential exchange gives thought to objectives and means of achieving desiredresponses from other parties. According American to Marketing Association, 'Marketing Management is the process of planning and executing the conception, pricing, promotion, and distribution of ideas, goods, and services to create exchanges that individual andorganizational satisfy objectives'. This definition recognizes that marketingmanagement is process involving analysis, planning, implementation, and control; that it covers ideas, goods and services; that it rests on thenotion of exchange; and that the goal is to produce satisfaction for theparties involved.

1.4 Marketing concepts

Firms vary in their perceptions about business, and their orientations to the market place. This has led to the emergence of many different concepts of marketing. Marketing activities should be carried out undersome well-thought out philosophy of efficient, effective, and responsiblemarketing. There are six competing concepts under which organisations conduct their marketing activity.

1.4.1. Exchange concept

The exchange concept of marketing, as the very name indicates, holdsthat the exchange of a product between the seller and the buyer is thecentral idea of marketing. While exchange does form a significant part ofmarketing, to view marketing as more exchange will result in missing outthe essence of marketing. Marketing is much broader exchange. Exchange, at best, covers the distribution aspect and the pricemechanism. The other important aspects of marketing, such as, concernfor customer, generation of value satisfactions, creative selling andintegrated action for serving customer. completely overshadowed inexchange concept.

1.4.2. Production concept

Managers of production-oriented organisationsconcentrate on achieving high It is one of the oldest concepts guiding sellers. The production concept holds that customers will favour those products production efficiency and wide distributioncoverage. The assumption that consumers are primarily interested in productavailability and low price holds in at least two types of situations. Thefirst is where the demand for a product exceeds supply. Here consumers are more interested in obtaining the product than in its fine points. Thesuppliers will concentrate on finding ways to increase production. Thesecond situation is where the product's cost is high and has to bebrought down through increased productivity to expand the market.

1.4.3. The product concept

The product concept holds that consumers will favour those products that offer quality or performance. Managers in these product-orientedorganisations focus their energy on making good products and improving them over time. These managers assume that buyers admire well-made product and canappraise product quality and performance. These managers are caughtup in a love affair with their product and fail to appreciate that themarket may be less "turned on" and may even be moving in different direction.

The product concept leads to "marketing myopia", an undueconcentration on the product rather than the need. Railroadmanagement thought that users wanted trains rather thantransportation and overlooked the growing challenge of the airlines, buses, trucks, and automobiles. Slide-rule manufacturers thought thatengineers wanted slide rules rather than the calculating capacity and over looked the challenge of pocket calculators.

1.4.4. The selling concept

The selling concept holds that consumers, if left alone, will ordinarily notbuy enough of the organization's products. The organization must herefore an aggressive selling and promotion effort.

The concept assumes that consumers typically show buying inertia orresistance and have to be coaxed into buying more, and that the company has available a whole battery of effective selling and promotiontools to stimulate more buying. The selling concept is practiced most aggressively with "sought goods",those goods that buyers normally do not think of buying, such asinsurance, encyclopedias, and funeral plots. These industries haveperfected various sales techniques to locate prospects and hardsell themon the benefits of their product. Hard selling also occurs with soughtgoods, such as automobiles. Most firms practice selling concept whenthey have overcapacity. Their aim is to sell what they make rather thanmake what they can sell. Thus selling, to be effective, must be preceded by several marketingactivities such as needs assessment, marketing research, productdevelopment, pricing, and distribution. If the marketer does a good job of identifying consumer needs, developing appropriate products, andpricing, distributing, and promoting them effectively, these products willsell very easily. When Atari designed its first video game, and whenMazda introduced its RX-7 sports car, these manufacturers wereswamped with orders because they had designed the "right" productbased on careful marketing homework.

1.4.5. The marketing concept

The marketing concept holds that the key to achieving organizationalgoals consists in determining the needs and wants of target markets anddelivering the desired satisfactions more effectively and efficiently than competitors.

Theodore Levitt drew a perceptive contrast between the selling andmarketing concepts. Selling focuses on the needs of the seller; marketingon the needs of the buyer. Selling is preoccupied with the seller's need toconvert his product into cash; marketing with the idea of satisfying theneeds of the customer by means of the product and the whole cluster ofthings associated with creating, delivering and finally consuming it.

Market focus:

No company can operate in every market and satisfy everyneed. Nor can it even do a good job within one broad market: Evenmighty IBM cannot offer the best customer solution for every computerneed. Companies do best when they define their target markets carefully. They do best when they prepare a tailored marketing program for eachtarget market.

Customer orientation:

A company can define its market carefully andstill fail at customer-oriented thinking. Customer-oriented thinking requires the company to define customer needs from the customer pointof view, not from its own point of view. Every product involves tradeoffs, and management cannot know what these are without talking to andresearching customers. Thus a car buyer would like a high-performancecar that never breaks down, that is safe, attractively styled, and cheap. Since all of these virtues cannot be combined in one car, the cardesigners must make hard choices not on what pleases them but ratheron what customers prefer or expect. The aim, after all, is to make a salethrough meeting the customer's needs. Why is it supremely important to satisfy customer? Basically because company's sales each period come from two groups: customers andrepeat customers. It always costs more to attract new customers than toretain current customers. Therefore customer retention is more criticalthan customer attraction.

Coordinated marketing:

Unfortunately, not all the employees in acompany are trained or motivated to pull together for the customer

Coordinated marketing means two things. First, the various marketingfunctionssales-force, advertising, product management, marketingresearch, and so onmust be coordinated among themselves. Too oftenthe sales-force is mad at the product managers for setting "too high aprice" or "too high a volume target", or the advertising director and abrand manager cannot agree on the best advertising campaign for thebrand. These marketing functions must be coordinated from the customer point of view.

Second, marketing must be well coordinated withthe other departments. Marketing does not work when it is merely adepartment; it only works when all employees appreciate the effect theyhave on customer satisfaction.

Profitability:

The purpose of the marketing concept is to helporganizations achieve their goals. In the case of private firms, the majorgoal is profit; in the case of non-profit and public organizations, it issurviving and attracting enough funds to perform their work. Now thekey is not to aim for profits as such but to achieve them as a by-productof doing the job well. This is not to say that marketers are unconcerned with profits. Quite thecontrary, they are highly involved in analyzing the profit potential of different marketing opportunities. Whereas salespeople focus onachieving salesvolume goals, marketing people focus on identifying profit-making opportunities.

1.4.6. The societal marketing concept

In recent years, some people have questioned whether the marketingconcept is appropriate organizational philosophy in an age ofenvironmental deterioration, resource shortages, explosive population growth, world hunger and poverty, and neglected social services. Thequestion is whether companies that do an excellent job of sensing, serving, and satisfying individual consumer wants are necessarily acting in the best long-run interests of consumers and society. The societal marketing concept holds that the organization's task is todetermine the needs, wants, and interests of target todeliver desired markets and the effectively satisfactions more and efficiently thancompetitors in a way that preserves or enhances the consumer's and thesociety's well-being.The societal marketing concept calls upon marketers to balance threeconsiderations in setting their policies, marketing namely, consumerwant companyprofits, and satisfaction, and public interest.

1.5 Marketing Mix

Marketing Mix is the set of marketing tools that the firm uses to pursueits marketing objectives in the target market. It is the sole vehicle forcreating and delivering customer value.

It was James Culliton, a noted marketing expert, who coined theexpression marketing mix and described the marketing manager as amixer of ingredients. To quote him, "The marketing man is a decider andan artist – a mixer of ingredients, who sometimes follow a recipedeveloped by others and sometimes prepares his own recipe. And, sometimes he adapts his recipe to the ingredients that are readilyavailable and sometimes invents some new ingredients, or, experiments with ingredients as no one else has tried before'.Subsequently Niel H. Borden, noted another marketing expert,popularized concept the marketing mix. It was Jerome McCarthy, thewell known American Professor of first marketing, who described themarketing mix in terms of the four Ps. The classified the marketing mixvariables under four heads, each beginning with the alphabet 'p'.

- Product
- Price
- Place (referring to distribution)
- Promotion

McCarthy has provided an easy to remember description of themarketing mix variables. Over the years, the terms-Marketing mix andfour Ps of marketing-have come to be used synonymously.

- Product: The most basic marketing mix tool is product, whichstands for the firm's tangible offer to the market including the product quality, design, variety features, branding, packaging, services, warranties etc.
- Price:A critical marketing mix tool is price, namely, the amount ofmoney that customers have to pay for the product. It includes deciding on wholes ale and retail prices, discounts, allowances, and credit terms. Price should be

- commensurate with the perceived value of the offer, or else buyer will turn to competitors in choosing their products.
- Place: This marketing mix tool refers to distribution. It stands forvarious activities the company undertakes make to the producteasily available and accessible to target customers. It includesdeciding on identify, recruit, and link various middlemen andmarketing facilitators so that products are efficiently supplied to the target market.
- Promotion:The fourth marketing mix tool. stands for the variousactivities the company undertakes to communicate its products'merits and to persuade target customers to buy them. It includes deciding on hire, train, and motivates salespeople to promote itsproducts to middlemen and other buyers. It also includes settingupcommunication and promotion programs consisting of advertising, personal selling, sales promotion, and public relations.

1.6 Summary

Marketing starts with the customers and ends with customers. Meaningmarketing starts with the identification of needs and ofcustomers and ends with wants satisfying it with product or services. Marketinghas its origin in the fact that humans are creatures of needs and wants. Need and wants create a state of discomfort. which is resolved throughacquiring products that satisfy these needs and wants. Most modernsocieties work on the principle of which means that exchange, peoplespecialize in producing particular products and trade them for the otherthings they need. They help in making transactions and relationship. A market is a group of people who share a similar need. Marketingencompasses those activities involved in working with markets, that trying to actualize exchanges. Marketing management is theconscious effort to achieve desired exchange outcomes with targetmarkets. The marketer's basic skill lies influencing the level, timing, and composition of demand for a product, service, organization, place, person or idea. Marketing can be vital to an organization's success.

1.7 Reference

- [1] Kasper, H., Van Helsdingen, P., & De Vries, W. (1999). Services marketing management: an international perspective. Chichester.
- [2] Kasper, H., Van Helsdingen, P., & Gabbott, M. (2006). Services marketing management: a strategic perspective.
- [3] Wilmshurst, J., & Mackay, A. (2002). The fundamentals and practice of marketing. Routledge.
- [4] Wilmshurst, J., & Mackay, A. (2002). The fundamentals and practice of marketing. Routledge.